The Highwayman Teaches Me About Sex and Death

by Kirsty Logan

you've finished? says the teacher. good girl, read a book. graze-kneed and rain-blown, in the library I am queen of all the soldiers and genies and foxes and chocolatiers. cross-legged among my courtiers I empty shelves, make a house out of stacks, spines rainbowing. I open the first of my subjects: a poem-story of a highwayman, the landlord's daughter, and her love. I turn pages and the pictures breathe:

The wind was a torrent of darkness among the gusty trees hooves moon dark latch eyes coins rope trap Bess the landlord's daughter, the landlord's blackeyed daughter gun breasts dress shame shouts blood blood

I rise slowly — a flower opening — with the book held holy as a veil. behind me, stacks of children's stories left as cairns.
