

The Imbecilic Utterances (or Why is every man's burden the heaviest?)

by Kog Zadare

"Come into my face." said Duras famously as she neared death. This is very beautiful. If one takes Duras to speak of something akin to the 'face' as given us by Levinas, and we may display this face here as something like an Husserlian universal (neither as idea or as pure being) one can, for the sake of edification draw a parallel between the 'face' that suffers the slings and arrows of representation and the plight of Being itself in its capacity as a well of meaning that suffers the assault of modern Entertainments Sic. Duras who adhered in the place of Duras the writer, who said to the other you are speaking to "Duras", at once jumped across all levels and said "Come into my face" and this is very beautiful.

If one conceives of psychoanalysis, taking the cue from Levinas who said /Isn't it a kind of pornography?/, and posit analysis itself as an entertainment, one can quickly adduce the relevance of the tendentious anti-religiosity of the Freudian and Marxian legacy and the introduction of contemporary "Science" that is supposed to have rescued us from the superstitions and incoherency of the past. Rather, just as Alva Noe observed that the only thing "astonishing" about Crick's "astonishing hypothesis" is the degree of stupefaction necessary us to not notice that it, the claim that Mind/Consciousness is the Brain, is only the most natural continuation of first philosophy, especially from the time of Descartes onward.) Likewise, Marx, far from "flipping Hegel" on his ass, has done nothing of the kind - he has ejaculated only within the tendentious current of idealism until it became unobservable to the contemporary conception like the thing unobservable through over proximity, too close, the purloined letter of Poe etc..

If man is the abstract animal and the contemporary as distinguished from the modern age is the moment when we notice that the artificial or constructed world has finally 'won out' - that today and only today we can view nature as the underdog and the pathetic victim of the abstract beast - we can see that the built world only now offers fully abundant entertainment value that is sufficient to replace meaning : That our now dominant abstract world is overwhelming, in its practical efficiency, being itself. That in the sense of that Darth Vader like fellow Zizek, whose master Governor Tarkin (from the original Star Wars movie) i.e. Jacques Lacan when he speaks of the efficiency of the symbolic order is talking about a world where the human will and agency is perceived as greater than Being itself, is conceived of as the mono-valence / universal principle to die for and moreover it is a principle that is, properly, in the contemporary 'Les- Non-dupes errant' (if u don't follow it your an ass because it's fucking powerful) functional. This is why Marxism pretends to be a "materialism" - because the idea world, the abstract world, has become Big time.

Natural Science is an hallucinatory idealism as we have shown elsewhere. It is the unbroken continuation of the Socratic project as condemned by Nietzsche and embraced by Hegel (and geared up by Marx), an idealism that mirrors the constructed world, the world of the abstract animal, and follows the current of externalization of meaning i.e. Entertainment that fills the old lack left open in the mental economy.

popular saint, especially among sailors and Sufi mystics. His legend is based on a narrative from the Qur'an, which tells how a "man of God" helps Musa (Moses) search for a fish and at the same time performs seemingly senseless actions such as sinking a boat and killing a young man. By questioning him, Musa forfeits his patronage. Arab commentators embellished the story, giving him the name Khidr ("Green") and claiming that he turned green upon diving into the spring of life. In Pakistan he is identified with a water deity who protects mariners and river travelers. Among Sufis he is associated with the ever-living spiritual function that can guide people on the spiritual path." - from some web of site
