Beowulf in Hell (in Anglo-Saxon alliterative verse)

by Kyle Muntz

They strung him up, and beat him with sticks. and bent his muscles. They taunted, "We shall of being a man." men crowded in They drank blood they drank the rain they spat bits of they sang fragments had already forgotten. small animals between their teeth. thunder sheered the clouds. away, mountains began to walk, the mountain paths, trees. Beowulf looked towards soup. is to be soup, to be a sheep, to be string. to be an axe. to be the reek in the stables The children have Wind settles. dew hovers. thoughts shiver stowed on the balcony, and beat him with rocks. and bared his insides. teach you the meaning Beyond the rafters, many large groups. drained from children, of distant countries, spawned children, of songs the world Across the hall. scurried, breadcrumbs Blasted by wind, Thousands of miles woke. Hillsides bringing with them the many outlying towards his innards: To be a man to be a goat, to be an ox. to be cattle. to be wolves. of black dung in the evening. crossed inside it. winding the fields, dappling the leaves, through darkness, Available online at «http://fictionaut.com/stories/kyle-muntz/beowulf-in-hell-in-anglo-saxon-alliterative-verse» Copyright © 2012 Kyle Muntz. All rights reserved.

the hours shuffle,	the hour turns,
the calf bleeds,	the cart breaks,
the man shits,	the man dies,
the boy dies,	the boy fails,
the flower curls,	the fields cool,
the stove cools,	the steel hardens, and flies settle	fitly the remains	(of the battlefield).
This, Beowulf thinks,	this is the truth of being a man,	to be a life, a sprouting limb,	a scavenging beast,
to die like a wolf,	to die like a dog.
I die right now:	a dog. There is no God, there was	never a God, never a battle,	never a monster.
He feels a tree	fall in the center of a forest. He imagines	for a moment the animals in their dens.	All of them would eat him, they	would. A small child spits in his face.	Children pelt him with rocks. A girl	rears her arms.
Her face is small,	her figure is thin.
She crushes him like	a crass boulder, dropped heavily	down the rocks.	