Born of Flight

by Larry Strattner

I can walk among words, Scatter them like birds,
to compose two thirds of a poem, when they settle
on nearby wires,
in an order inspiring
wonder.

What do they think, when I scatter them asunder. Bring them disarray, Shape them to a raucous cloud of noir ballet, to chatter at me, their tart sorbet, a squawking I shape to reggae, depicting long, dark, passageways, emerging into a sudden Monet a pastel perfect, vibrant bouquet born of the shrieks from a Stellar Iay.

This is the magic passageway out from the world of yesterday, relaxing into today's sobriquet.
