

San Francisco

by Larry Strattner

Neptune's brush strokes

foam on gray.

Separating

scraggly land

from his windblown,

drawing hand.

Islands skip;

improbable rocks.

Refuge stones.

Sprouting trees,

grass to sit

surreptitious watch

crawling cars

cross a bridge to Fremont.

Icy, fog-scrubbed water sheathes your frozen toes.

You wonder

could you make the swim back from Alcatraz?

A dead whale drifts,

blow-hole bloated closed.

His singing pod has paid respects.

Now are off

crooning back hastas and luegos.

Floating here behind

gulls will peck his eyes.

His pod is off to visit friends in Tierra del Fuego.

City claws clutch tortured lands futile dreams of permanence.
A tremor, even seven,
may dislodge a greedy grasp.
One thousand seals dive off piers into solace only water brings.

These burning years huddled masses flame and seethe.
Bridges fall,
buildings telescope within themselves.
Fantastic druid magic incanted by ten thousand elves abetted by the tunnel trolls rend spider webs of tempered steel woven by the men who are not real;
who slide into the sea, peeling squealing fingernails searching for a purchase on sinking glass and money.

Fires of blue and red consume wails of magnates perishing lost in lava storms, smoothed by gray white ash.
Memories of glory dashed beneath relentless seas rising to eradicate the stain of whatever grandeur may remain.
