

Cutting Rhubarb in the Rain

by Linda Simoni-Wastila

Cutting rhubarb in the rain, the mottled leaves thick with mud and slugs, I wonder if these plants, robust now, will stand another season in this shaded corner.

If not, next spring my husband will surprise me bearing rhizomes, and plant them so my garden will be as my mother's, and her mother's and, perhaps, all our mothers' before.

I'll slice the stalks into chunks for pie, mine has strawberries, though she says berries ruin the rhubarb; she makes sauce and eats from the pot, still warm, spoon clanking against the sides, a smile trespassing her face.

Tendering these stalks, making the pie, heralds me a holder of apron strings, honoring our history unmarked with words or trophies, thus all the more important.

I wonder how my daughter will grow her rhubarb.

