THE KING OF ULSTER

by Lucien Quincy Senna

And you walked with me in drear-nighted February through the smell of petrol in the farmer's yard.

Your song is a piece of global clay and clay grows wild magnetic Gael roses.

The splendour of colour in this life is as rare as holding a symphony midst the siren's wail and shockheaded metal violence.

Light of my eye hazel and sallow flower You were imprisoned by a bit part in history-granted a proletarian choice by dawn gryphons-denounced what you loved with dignity.

Victims and riots in so many parts--Peace may yet be possible in this moment, as you lead me up the creaking stairs, gently by the hand.
