benedictus

by M. F. Sullivan

he wanders the house crying for the hairless tomcat

(gone for the night on an overnight job).

arms stretch up the christmas tree, grabbing at a platinum orb, until i hiss from behind the keyboard.

i watch him zip across the room then sulk toward the door as he sings about the tragedy of discipline in the yowls of a foreign language grown familiar.

somehow i feel guilty, watching his twitching tail.

i'll have to get him a treat once i've finished this poem.