Downtown

by Mark Waldrop

From the parking lot to the stadium down town waiting for the crossing light there are a few others in jerseys but not many we are too early for that.

Desert gravel crunching scuffle of canvas shoes kicking granite hop along wobble steps and I turn to see who's off the sidewalk because nobody needs to be off the sidewalk down town.

Faded sweater, face lit up with all but teeth and a knit cap in the summer time he says, "You see this, motherfucker?" Emerging toward the side walk, road cones arc out behind him like a comet trail.

"Motherfucker," he says, "The Beastie Boys are coming." He's holding a crumpled flier and he points at it, dancing toward me. "Beastie Boys and their toys, I gotta see them make some noise. Shit. Fourty-five dollars.

I ain't got no fourty-five dollars, motherfucker." I can't tell if he's from New York or if he just thinks he is.

And then, for some reason I say, "When they coming?" She's pulling at my arm and he's turning a circle, The white man is blinking and we all cross, he's dancing a limp uneven dance, a wet tulip in the desert.

"Next month," he says. "I gotta see this, some crazy shit."

Available online at «http://fictionaut.com/stories/mark-waldrop/downtown» Copyright © 2010 Mark Waldrop. All rights reserved.

"Yeah," I say. "Crazy." And he's off the sidewalk again dancing his wet flower dance toward another corner.

/