

Surrendering August

by Michael Gillan Maxwell

Surrendering August

early evening, late summer walking down the lake road with the dogs the sound of a tractor mowing the field above grinding and clanking tall grasses pulsate with cricket song the water, placid and serene opalescent pink and turquoise a fish surfaces and dives leaving ripples in concentric rings on the far shore, in the vineyards timed charges explode like the sun catching on fire it scares crows away from the grapes warm sunny afternoons and chilly evenings sumac leaves, blood crimson splashed across the blue forever mornings laden with fog banks and soaking dew migrating flocks wheel across the sky air still warm from the day, but soon changing into the fecund smell of damp coolness black walnut trees already starting to turn shedding golden leaves that flutter like tears onto green grass last to arrive and the first to go a little girl rides her bike, training wheels still on stops at the foot of the steep hill she'll be climbing before long but not for a while kids going back to school pinching their noses shut as they hurl themselves off the dock

Available online at «<http://fictionaut.com/stories/michael-gillan-maxwell/surrendering-august>» Copyright © 2014 Michael Gillan Maxwell. All rights reserved.

into the cool blue water already a memory the season slipping away away, like this day like youth gobbled up by the unremitting passage of time it feels over too soon already ending when it seems it's only just begun the pale rider draws closer with each trip around the sun I stand at the edge of the shoreline the edge of the season
surrendering August

