Big Blue

by Michael Tusa

Standing on the edge of the great shelf

Quilts and comforters Bright blue pools of water As far as any eye can see

Making dust Collecting it

Tracing out along the precipice Running my fingers down the long white line

Hiding from and being seen Watching and waiting in hunger Ringing and longing with silence Riding on and on and on to anywhere now

The great breadth of new dawn rises out from her brown basin Black birds begin to call out their claims of victory over the night perched high in their naked branches

Silken snowflakes waltz warmly down the crystalline stair case far from the towers and belfry and cracked ceiling of sky Finally face to face with my maker The dance resumes But I do not
