bienvenue (a poem)

by Peter Erich

if you lost your list on your way here i will help you get what you came for.

a fabric that holds its weight, waders to fish for baubles, noisemakers that can knock all the boys from their feet, and these things will be yours alone.

but you sigh. you sigh, and you say my effort just isn't good enough, and in one infinite exhale of expectations i become small and burrow into myself, quietly raging like a boobytrap.

and it happens again, and again, and it builds, and it will become more. it will be louder, and it will be brightly colored and "it" will become "i" and i will be the master of ceremonies describing what is about to go down.

it will start with a song and it will end with a traffic jam and i will never again be less, and i will pose in the center of the freeway and i will walk-off conquering; for me, safe behind the sandbags, alone, drinking what i came for, as the bombs go off.

Available online at "http://fictionaut.com/stories/peter-erich/bienvenue-a-poem--2"

Copyright © 2016 Peter Erich. All rights reserved.

.