How We Open Doors

by Philip F. Clark

My mother used to say,

"God doesn't close one door without opening another."

but I tell you, Atheist I am, I have heard them slam;

I have searched for keys to broken locks, I have sweated in the sun and looked all day under certain rocks.

I tell you I have banged on wood, I have banged on metal; I have knocked and knocked to be let in; I have run away from dogs and much too eager men, when all I sought was some room that could be entered -- we'll call it welcome -- and welcome seemed out for the whole day. I have looked in windows, and I tell you this:

those who aren't home are never seen.

though hidden behind curtains, they waited for me to go away. Yes, there have been doors that never opened, and hands bruised from pounding never heard an echo inside. You speak of what we let in, and I speak of what is left out -- and calling at the top of my voice did no good it seemed. What choice is there for the stalwart against a closed door?

And so when you opened yours, I was surprised at the sound of my throat, half-begging in its yell, and you, silent -- as if I had only rung the rusted bell -- extending something close to what I would call entry, if entry can be called how with faith you kissed me.
