Miss Havisham's Fire

by Philip F. Clark

Miss Havisham went up in an ardent flame -- a gladiolus that bloomed fast and thick catching her breath somewhere between ecstasy and surprise. The cake soon flowered too, and then everything bloomed: the silk and the chairs, her lace and her desire; the windows flared as she turned, looking around the room whose furniture for years held only you.