

The Catcher and the Caught

by Philip F. Clark

Like the swift night-black blue of a cormorant as it suddenly dips into a rush of white cold water, eyeing its possible food, we too sweep down on what we think we see, rising wet sometimes with the reward, or hapless, dripping, we try again.

