Unsent by Philip F. Clark

The letter never found an eye. I opened it, forgetting it was mine; its paper worn to dough, its ink a ghosted blue on the page. I could just make out words, untethered sentences: '. . . your decision,' '. . . years from now,' '. . . A risk on my part.'

To whom had I wanted to send it? No face came back to me. It was an erasure now, made with years of bad weather. The rest was conjecture -- my eyes trying to make out its runes; a puzzle. I kept it. I put it back in the wet and crumbling box.

All day I thought of it -- by whom it may have been held. The winter kept its promise of snow. I do not have the hand I had then, nor the paper -- not an image came to me. And this is where we end -the exorbitant eye of forgotten days.
