

Inheritance

by Renee Blair

I blame you for my short temper when I go off the handle when my blood runs cold and I can't think straight I can only react.
When I say things I don't mean
Even if I do.
But I am glad
for the fire you started inside of me.
That time I stood in front of The White House with people I did not know for something we all believed in.
The time I yelled at the woman who owned the dog who hurt my rabbit, as my grandfather whispered
"Hush."
A mother's love is like a bonfire, and I smile as I nurture the embers that have fallen into place inside of me.

