

The First Snowfall

by Robert Salley

My cheek was pressed against the cold window.

From the kitchen,

the smell of the small cedar chips burning in the fireplace,

I watched millions of flakes fall past the street lamp, floating to the ground below.

