

After: An All American, Post 9-11 Love Poem

by Sarah McKinstry-Brown

After he got on one knee, and she said, I do. After they watched the televised bombs disappear the city. After everyone fell asleep. After shock and awe, him and her making love while tanks rolled through that desert city's streets, erasing memory. After forgetting their sorrow, and bringing the babies into the gaping blue. After nursing and swaddling while department store massacres unfolded, perfume counters and bullet casings on the brink of Christmas. Red, red, blue red, blue. After sirens. After boys with black hole eyes emptying their grief into automatic weapons. After playing house, buying curtains, making lists, pretending to be perennial and not just another boom. After the cold, hard ground, the evergreens mute and blazing. After the mothers and fathers on the other end of the headlines, the news of children huddled in closets.

After eyes hollow, after no ground could ever be hallowed. After she heard the news and called him, both of them with nothing to give the other except a silence to weep against. After winter after winter, after winter, after winter, it's a wonder it didn't happen sooner:

The two of them screaming at each other in the restaurant parking lot, the bar, the idling car, the neon blue and red Open sign coloring their faces with bruises, blinking, open open open.

After he, after he gets on one knee, and she says, I do. I do. After they watch the televised bombs, the nothing blooming. After everyone falls

making love while tanks roll through another city, erasing memory,

Oh, America, who are you to tell them that love is anything but holding on.
