

Downland Ballad I :Photo- disintegration

by Shaun Belcher

Fully five acres further east and fifty years on from Harwell's neutron beam photo-disintegration a clump of Queen Anne's Lace(1) wavers like a bridesmaid's posy above the quarried chalk and flint of this erased line.
The track that gravelled and iron girded once carried trundling freight to Southampton docks and salt air.

Like a distant memory of past expectations I wander through past journeys, delineations chew on the fresh air like a discontented Wordsworth now free, free to roam where I will But nothing is moving here these days, no air pulses through the gilded corn, american maize is rigid

All rhythm, rhyme and reason curtailed but for the hover of Kite and wizz of combustion engines I'm left standing in a shower of butterflies, climate driven, wheeling baffling the constant walkers and their dogs with showers of atoms, as they spin into extinction.

The land is porous, half soaked with the elixir and charms of the abandoned plastic barrels concoctions.
A squadron of crows bank and wheel in tight formation land and beaks probe at all the matter before them.
Beady eyed they cannot count the consequences of all that steel now disappearing from the horizon.

In a damp corner of a thatched cottage an artist(2) peels Queen Anne's Lace from the paper Dips it gently into a brimming tray of liquid and the fusion of paper and molecules of silver re-arranging maps a negative of stalk, leaf and stamen.
Up north the furnaces fizzle and peak for the century.

Sheffield steel, Welsh coal, Cornish tin, the land exhausted potmarked and reclaimed in a thousand regeneration schemes, The process of covering the tracks of a century of production is taken up by rose bay willow herb, buddleia and oxford ragwort, each seeking to mask the brick and fence beneath it.
In the laboratory the encased hand holding the uranium phial quivers

as an owl is lit by a police cars headlights on the perimeter.
Its flash of white against a wilderness of dark downland like that brief explosion, that jolt of life in a vacuum.
The century starts to implode draws itself as a negative image, trickles, spits and fuses the image of a landscape removed becomes these islands.

The bromide stains her fingers, the plant collapses into stalk and seed as she raises its negative to the kitchen window.
She stands looking at it again in the porchlight amidst the blackout realising that all this movement above and below, these planes, these tanks hurtling towards the coast and far fields of France are dying already A moth sings against the candle flame, erupts into vapour, darkness.

- 1. local Oxfordshire name for Cow Parsley which it resembles*
- 2. Eileen Sherwood-Moore artist of Blewbury, Berkshire (1909-1998) experimented with photograms* more shaunbelcher poetry here...

<http://www.shaunbelcher.com/writing>

