

Frozen

by stephen hastings-king

The early morning temperature was a typo, fog rising off the ocean its surface moving like outside was a film running backward and I thought: How strange to arrive so soon at a pivot, the next move I make will change everything; drinking a cup of coffee, standing by a filigree ice window looking through a hole at a phantom aqua city drifting across the horizon.

