

White

by stephen hastings-king

Tonight my mind is spatter on a screen. In an alternate possibility you flash across an ice field. I follow into a maze of identical white corridors. The walls are lattices of spectral pinpoint fragments of the sun. My walking drains away all momentum. This is what it is to feel yourself forget.

