

our measured treads

by strannikov

in the neighborhood of Vesuvius for Herculaneum as for Pompeii the blast announced: "too late to flee". all public streets each private space all sites decreed—no lives survive.

—yet frantic to outrun the racing sky useless curses hurled 'pon falling down moments colliding cooking frozen steps paces cease as hot grey mortar swims few hurries left to be in—carts horses mules without speed with no escapes no paths away shores achoke while being pushed offshore boats ablaze float off to sink as ash displaces every air no space for bugs nor birds to fly.

racing only out of life this day concealing child's from ashen air bricks lie beneath thick mortared rain grey ash the whisper of the world all silences are swallowed gone.

clouds had to be inhaled this day no place was given else to breathe: faithful dogs howl and howl no more rats perish, cats slink off to die each curled into enduring sleep in each grey corner hidden deep relentless storms of ash fell grey rinsing floors caking tiles silencing all steps.

moans of final prayers subside: hearing gods listen as ashes wash over those towns hear floods of ash wash through those towns into submerged sealed silenced sleeps.

crowds commuting to

I recall hearing hundreds sprawl across the terminal's paved floors most for the escalators bound (career-bound for cabs, at least some few) most a scurry of legs like me legs quick as the wheels of the trains that had traveled us there, that far.

some dashed to one side first to shop:
might drop off some shoes for repair or browse newspaper racks for truth (preferred reads for coffees at desks) bagels doughnuts cinnamon buns voices asleep in coffee queues.

I saw over twelve hundred times morning commutes across five years regularly keen to see them more faces an hour than back home (where not one minute's faces lived, nor to be seen in just one day)— hundreds of faces, thousands, too, varieties of faces read for features expressions displayed for what their histories could tell.

through twenty seasons faces march—not as battalions, regiments aligned in step, alike in garb—but pedestrian, none the less.

their faces moved as fast as legs through any weather any day (Mondays through Fridays, holidays off) with and without umbrellas in hand with and without overcoats and hats depending on the season and day, no scarves in summer, gloved winter hands.

—and the god presiding over all a four-faced, double-Janused clock its equal seconds clickt away ticking us our steps and breaths timing us to traffic and to trains chronicling moments of blurring sight circling over chattered talk clattered steps—but not naming once how late the day.
