

Perfect

by Swanson Tudor

Perfect

A Saturday afternoon, all sun, no humidity where people dream of hiking looking forward later to a little chilled wine, cold pasta salad an afternoon for me to walk three short blocks to sit beside Arthur at the bar and after a while he talked about his poetry in the angry resigned way he talked we talked about disappointments collected and held close to our spleen a soccer game lingered on the television, not enough to distract me the tiny figures running and stopping across the huge field. I only know Galeano's little book of the past with Montevideo, Sao Paulo; when they caroused all night into the early morning hours the next day in the midst of hangovers spitting phlegm on the muddy tracks of grass making those spectacular goals to keep them from going back to the docks, factories and mines that always wait Arthur was on a roll, champion of the simple stanza with heart versus depraved witty sestina and the subtle class war of the writing workshops; it called for me to add a little diplomacy for argument's sake but I had skipped breakfast and was already feeling the beer so I asked Arthur what he thought of the two women sitting together at a back table as he explained to me that one was a neighbor, who had never spoken to him in three years I watched us through the bar mirror most of Arthur's face obscured by a bottle of something blue our hour long story unfolding, without an ending of note

I would be the first to leave gathering up my cigarettes and lighter half standing waiting for him to recognize my departure I glanced toward the back table before opening the door onto a perfect afternoon.

