

Breaking Bread at Al Qalzam

by Tawnysha Greene

My first time alone with the women in Saudi Arabia, abayas, head covers off and I see their faces, their hair free. Hands touch me, lead me down a line of greetings, kisses, whispers in Arabic that I try to return, trilled rs, long ms, they laugh, because my words are

Egyptian, not Saudi, not ours, they say. I watch, follow what they do, sit on the ground, drink gawa from tiny gold cups, nibble whole fried fish with my right hand. We break bread, strangers, now friends, uncovered, naked in a way, because they speak to me of love.

They motion with their hands, point to themselves, each other, then at me, pause to see if I understand, stop between streams of Arabic to say daughter, sister, lover.
