

Back East

by Tim G. Young

Was thinking today of a brisk walk along 42nd Street in the block between sixth and fifth avenue gazing at my churning feet and the park known as Bryant

From this distance the concrete is nostalgia under my feet not as hard as it used to be Flying back and forth on my own wings would keep greenbacks in the bank and allow closer inspection of the Mississippi

Could even drift off to New Orleans for a slow sip of a hurricane before a complex focus on the skyline

The Empire would poke me sliding down its spine stopping at 86 for one quick view

The streets nestled in their grid tying up in knots rushing to nowhere driving desperate in the rain pounding my city brain lost in the country.

